An experimental cluster randomised controlled trial (RCT) evaluated the effectiveness of a Multi-sensory Activities and Physical Activities program as an intervention to improve fundamental movement skills (FMS) in a novel outdoor setting for early childhood school-age children. Eighty-four 7th grade children (20 girls, 64% Australian background) were recruited, and their FMS skills were assessed at baseline using the Test of Gross Motor Development-2, and an eight week intervention program was conducted. Group outcomes included increased FMS (Aim 1), and the effects of a modified intervention were also evaluated. The modified intervention was associated with increased FMS acquisition when compared to a control condition, but not with improved retention. There were positive lessons for future use of environment-based activities in preschool and school.There are many places in the US where if you have a window that looks out onto a busy street you could call it something like "the balcony" or "the widow's walk." In California, it's called a "second story." And what makes the second-story living interesting, is often
